In my opinion, The Lion and the Mouse teaches the most important lesson because it teaches us we shouldn't judge someone by their size. This is important because the mouse saves the lion from the dangerous net to repay him for sparing his life all those years ago. The mouse is small, but he is also helpful. Just because I'm small, doesn't mean I can't help other people in my home or community! Helping others is important, no matter how big you are.

In my opinion, The Name Jar teaches the most important lesson because it teaches us to be proud of who you are and where you come from.

In the story, Unhei thinks about changing her name to something easier. But Unhei learns that her name is special because it's part of who she is.

At the end, Unhei becomes proud of her name and helps others understand it. She teaches them to respect others' cultures.

Just like Unhei, I sometimes feel shy about things that make me different. But I know that being different makes me special. For example, my name is a little different too, but I like it because it's a part of me. It makes me feel proud.
